ROOSEVELTS FUTURE

Discussing the various propositions to take care of President Roosevelt after his present term expires, William E. Curtis says he knows exactly what the President wants. Jake Ris has offered him his choice between another term as president or the mayoralty of Greater New York. Another man would have him, and all ex-presidents, made a senator for life. And that comes nearer the president's ambition according to Curtis. The correspondent goes on:

The president makes no secret of his ambition to come to the senate from the state of New York. He talks about it freely and anyone who has doubts on the subject has only to call at the white house and introduce that topic of conversation. Mr. Roosevelt will tell him frankly that he intends to hunt and travel for a year or so and then resume his active interest in politics and make the senate if possible. He declares frankly that his ambition lies there and that he hopes to realize it.

John Quincy Adams went back to the house of representatives after serving as president, and Andrew Johnson, though he was never elected to the presidency served out the unexpired term of Abraham Lincoln and later went back to the senate that was so nearly removed him from office by impeachment proceedings. These are, we believe, the only instances where ex-presidents have entered the political arena except as candidates for the presidency.

The country expects some measure of lofty dignity from its ex-presidents. Mr. Roosevelt might not mind engaging in a rough scramble for a New York senatorship, but to a great majority of the American public the spectacle would be most unpleasing. He is to have an opportunity, the story goes to become president of Harvard—a life and a career that should suit one with his sermonizing proclivities. Then when he longs for the strenuous he can get out and play football with the boys.

That would be much better than entering actively into partisan politics. The notion of making life senators out of our ex-presidents is not such a bad one for if a man is good enough to be president he certainly ought to be a first-class senator. Thus the nation would always have the active participation of its strongest and best, and there would be hardly enough of them to make a great political difference.
